

WHY AN AUTHOR WRITES AN ARTICLE

An article is an idea, a concept, or an image of an imaginary experience, or images of factual experiences, that the author may have come across casually or deliberately and by the use of his/her five senses in a logical and reasonable manner, actually or vicariously partaken or participated in those real or referenced experiences.

An author writes an article because he/she has something he/she believes is worthwhile, and for no other reason than to write about it and to communicate to readers that it has been written. When the writing euphoric state of mind makes its presence known, an author can do nothing other than to write; it is in the blood and must take form in the written word. It is a type of communication and needs to be expressed for the dialogue to take initiative effect upon its readers. Once this is accomplished, both writer and reader can establish a lucid exchange of ideas and come to a comprehension of those ideas.

This dialogue of comprehension between the written words of the author and the mind of the reader is precisely why an author writes an article, for that matter, that is why an author writes anything that he/she believes important, with the desire that it be circulated to readers for their enjoyment. Poetry, factual and mystery books, fiction, plays, critiques on all the above mentioned types of writings, etc., fall into this category; they must be written because they are in the blood of the author and he/she has pronounced them worthy.

Not all readers will agree with the body of work written, especially now that the internet has made writing almost a necessary form of communication that cannot be resisted even by would be writers because of its ease and almost instantaneous results; but even in disagreement, there can be an appreciation for the writing that has been purposely written for the enjoyment of its readers. I would encourage all who write to write and to write well.
